

Although nearly 500 years have passed since Carolina was written, victims of rape are still accused today: people still dare to believe that the victim actually wanted it or caused the rape with their behaviour. There are still people who think that those disclosing their experiences of sexual violence are on a fame trip or a revenge campaign, and do not understand why they were unable to talk about traumatic events immediately and come out with it only years later. According to research, most cases of sexual violence are actually left undisclosed and victims never seek help, a third of them never tell anyone what happened.