

Lonnie of Dunkri was said to have been sad, depressed, nervous, and scared at the end of her life. Although we cannot conclude anything about her mental state, research shows that mental health concerns are a significant health problem among prostitutes today. Most of them are stressed, nervous and tense. More than half suffer from depression and exhaustion. In addition, many have anxiety and sleep disorders. All rates of mental health problems are many times higher among prostitutes than on average among women, and two thirds of them feel the need to get help with emotional problems.
